

An empty school was one of the most surreal experiences for our teachers and staff! Without the company of students in the school, the hallways and classrooms were unusually quiet. As we all begin to navigate this inconsistent year and jump back and forth between in-person hybrid learning with the remote format, both teachers and students started to become more adaptive people. Even though our beloved building sat vacant for far too long, we were still learning many lessons and skills.

an empty Autumn

From Here to There...

No one could have anticipated the start of this school year. Instead of roaming the halls for our lockers and sitting in classroom desks, we attended our classes via Google Meets and turned in our papers through Schoology. The autumn semester looked very different compared to past years. The trials and tribulations with online and hybrid learning left both students and staff without typical school traditions and the confusing era of transitions to make in-person learning as safe as possible.

Who would have thought that we'd have to turn our own bedrooms into classrooms? Both students and staff started to get creative when it came to putting together a workspace that was both motivating and comforting, now that school was genuinely at our fingertips.
