DISCUSSING THE DRESS CODE

"I feel like the dress code is decent. I don't see very many kids getting dress coded but I also don't think that we should get dress coded for showing our stomachs, shoulders, or thighs because that's normal and everyone has them. That's normal and we are allowed to show them off if we want."

"I think that it's really unfair and in some cases kind of degrading towards certain people. The big part of it is over sexualizing pretty much only girls. Administration uses our male peers as a excuse to be harsh about the dress code. Like I said, it's 100% biased towards girls, which branches off into different body types or who the person is specifically."

- McKenzie Newport.

Brennan Drysdale

"I hate it. Like I just feel that it basically only sexualizes women a lot. Like why do we have to cover up to not "distract the boys." I think it's such a biased thing like why do you care more about what I wear and not my actual education?"

- Ayleen Quinonez.

"I comprehend why people support dress codes. I think professionalism is important in the workplace and there needs to be some standards to prevent situations that may be deemed "inappropriate," but I don't support dress codes when they are fortifying a patriarchal concept. Dress codes for women in particular feed into the concept that women are to blame for what happens to them, when it's simply not true. A woman was not "asking for it" when she was simply expressing herself through her wardrobe. I think if dress codes are equally reinforced for both parties, and the dress code isn't absurd and doesn't prevent self-expression, dress codes are fair. But as long as a dress code is in place to prevent a man from entertaining a certain situation or even acting upon it, they're ridiculous and fortify the idea that men can't control themselves."

- Perla Mejia

"The dress code comes after women more than men. I feel that all the stuff about boys being distracted by certain things is lame. Every person has a different body no matter what so different clothes look different on other people especially women. Like just two weeks ago a guy was walking around in a shirt a woman would've gotten sent home for wearing just because we have boobs. I suppose it keeps people in line on somethings but mostly it's just dumb."
