This year's 2023 National Western Stock Show held here in Denver, Colorado.

View- h a w

This year, the National Western Stock Show reached record attendance levels after not being held due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

Traditionally, attending the stock show and rodeo here in Denver was a big deal. The event was a chance for urban and rural communities to come together while enjoying classic western lifestyle. Families from all over the state, country, and even internationally, traveled to this event to show their livestock or to compete in the rodeo. Others enjoyed the shows, activities, and food. Junior, Kaia Weingardt, “went to the stock show because [her] friend Logan invited [her].” This being one of the first times she went, her favorite part was “being able to see a lot of different farm animals and the horses.” While meeting the animals may be the most interactive aspect of the stock show, the rodeo was where most of the fun takes place. “Seeing all of the different races and competitions at the rodeo” was also one of Kaia’s favorite parts. In addition, Logan Drennan enjoyed “watching the barrel racing at the rodeo.” She frequently attended the rodeo, as it was “a super fun and friendly environment.” This year specifically, she explained how “she went to the stock show also because [her] dad was working it because he is a fireman and [they] got free tickets to attend.” The unique atmosphere of the National Western Stock show attracted a large crowd. With activities for all ages, it’s no surprise that they hit high attendance numbers.
