ashion at Littleton High School went far beyond the outfit. Clothes served as a representation of our identities, a way to express what constitutes our essence. Whether it be those who religiously followed the trend cycle, or those who preferred to push the boundaries, they portrayed themselves through their fabrics. With the rise of y2K fashion, bubble braids, cargo pants and crew necks, everyone showcased their unique look as they attended chess club and math class. The confidence that came from wearing what made us feel like ourselves was unparalleled. Having fun with fashion is a pillar of the social scene at Littleton, as we continue to communicate our creativity and sense of self through our fashion choices.
